rected by a well known director. Deligars and the Woman, which will be shown at the Princess theater Sunday Monday and Tuesday, should please Alice Joyce's many admirer. Alice Joyce is the star, Albert Paysim Terhune the author, and George Terwilliger the director.

Every care was taken to make this production one of merit Great aftention was paid to intite details, many of which might escape the film fan unnoticed, but go it show the tier-oughness with which the producers made this production.

For instance, in the hanques scene a real dinner was served to the 205 persons in the episods. It was a full course chicken dinner, and it is beedless to say that the participants were doing something other than acting when filmed. The action is real.

These are little things which usight easily have been dispensed with, as far as the public is concerned, but they have a value in giving the production a realistic atmosphere and force the players to put forth an unconscious effort to make the production something more than "another six-reder." It is also significant that when the small details are religiously carried out the big things will be given greater attention.

The same care and precision was taken in selecting sets and locations. The titles were being designed with the view of working the atmosphere into the background and making them suggestive of the scenes that follow. This is another detail which, while not essential, goes to make a super-production.

Will Rogers Is Last Half Star At The Majestic

Will Rogers does some of the finest ciding of his screen career in "Water Water Everywhere," which comes to the Majestic thrater Thursday for three days. There is a mid race across country, which taxes to the utmost the effects and ability of both horse and rider, and which seems at times allowed to end in disaster.

There is a run which ends in a leap through, the door of a saloon, the horse bringing up abort in the middle of the floor. This required the most excellent co-ordination of brain and mustle to avoid being sweep from the horse when he entered the low door. The exit from the saloon is even. there when he entered the low door. The exit from the saloon is even more sensational. Mr. Rogers mounts the animal, dashes madly at the door, throws himself partiy out of the saldelle hanging by one foot, to avoid hitting the door frame, and is just recovering from this position when the horse leaps the high railing in front of the saleon, and is off at a mad gallop.

Just to work off cowboy spirits, Mr.
Rogers races through the streets of the town standing upright on his horse, swinging and swaying in perfect rhythm with the motion of the animal as he rounds curves and dodgen pedestrians.

And at the finish of the picture, comes a leap of horse and man into the swirling waters of a rocky stream to save the life of a girl.

The production is more than an exhibition of wonderful riding; it is a gripping story throughout, with a big, human theme, and an appealing love

As everybody knows, Tinney is a full fledged musical comedy star, and has been for some time, but Amy Leslie, the noted Chicago dramatic critic, accorded Jack Fox the honors of the show in her newspaper writeup, which Fox felt would make Tinney sore. With any other star Fox would have been in hot water, but Tinney was broadminded enough to accept it for all that it was worth, and congratulated Fox. Just to show him that there was no hard feeling, Tinney offered Fox a part in his new show, which the latter was obliged to decline on account of vaudeville bookings.
